We are pleased to introduce a brand new International ballet project — Canada All Star Ballet Gala. Featuring a star-studded cast, this carefully curated program will provide an enlightening overview of classic 19th and 20th century ballet through selections from masterpieces that defined the art form. This Gala will offer Canada's ballet aficionados a rare glimpse into the treasure trove of exquisite choreography that continues to dazzle audiences world-wide.

Ballet, like any art form, elicits a range of responses that reflect individual tastes and preferences. Still, there are universally acknowledged masterpieces. Once ahead of their time, their innovative spirit explored the vast possibilities of dance, opening it up to new expressions and paving the way to new forms that expanded ballet beyond the sphere of the "traditional". These time-tested masterpieces continue to serve as the standard bearers for excellence and master keys to future development.

As an art form, ballet is one of the most refined, complex, and grueling endeavors, exacting the highest set of skills from its performers. Ballet demands that stark individuality, personal charisma, and charm emanate from the stage; it calls not just for elusive artistry and musicality, but for physical prowess and flawless execution, all working in concert to bring forth a spellbinding, singular, inimitable performance style.

When it comes to classic choreography, world class performances are not all alike, as different traditions have produced notable distinctions in technique and presentation. These variations have allowed for the emergence of signature styles among top ballet schools around the world. That's why we can talk about the French, Danish, Russian, English, American, and in recent decades, Canadian schools of ballet. The latter has created a unique fusion of balletic traditions, melding the European and American cultural legacies into a new and fresh whole.

The objective of the Gala is to present to the distinguished members of the Canadian and international audience a showcase of these illustrious styles as performed by stars who, through their immense experience and interpretive gifts helped to sustain and elevate top performance standards.

The Canada All Star Ballet Gala is a gathering of highest artistic caliber. Designed to appeal to ballet aficionados of refined but varied tastes, the Program is a product of careful evaluation of concepts and themes familiar only to those with extensive knowledge of the art form, its inner workings, present-day processes and challenges, and unique access to the constellation of stars whose individual skills and repertoire background illuminate the breadth of contemporary dance realm.

Our Gala will provide an audience with an opportunity to see performers of the National Ballet of Canada alongside accomplished soloists from other elite ballet companies. This co-mingling will allow viewers a chance to observe first hand and evaluate the extent of the technical and aesthetic merits these ballet schools represent.

We would like to emphasize the importance of this Gala for Canada. It is an unprecedented event where each and every dancer is a world ballet star. Seven of 16 dancers are of the National Ballet of Canada. They will perform Classical Ballet masterpieces rarely seen in Canada.

We hope, from the bottom of our hearts, that you will find this to be a refreshing, exhilarating and memorable evening!

The Gala Organizers
Those who have seen a ballet masterpiece performed on stage will never forget the breathtaking exhilaration it brings on. In the nexus of choreographer’s innovative yet timeless vision, the inspired flawlessness of the performer’s technique, and the soaring musical score, the audience experiences the magic of the production on a visceral level.

A ballet masterpiece is recognized overtime for the superiority, originality, and complexity of its creative elements, especially the choreography. But the masterpiece is not complete without the performance, in which the artist hits every note, articulates movement with musical precision, exudes technical virtuosity, and communicates with accuracy and stark individuality the thrust of the narrative. A masterpiece performance must rise and meet the challenge of the choreographic masterpiece, underscoring its intention with dazzling execution and panache.

This fusion of artistry that links the choreographer and the performer is the pinnacle of the ballet experience we want you, the audience, to take away from The Canada All Star Ballet Gala. In this special program the perfection of masterpiece choreography will be matched by the performers’ pristine technique and imaginative style to create a cascade of standard bearing and unforgettable beauty.

On 11th of February 2017, 16 stars and superstars of classical ballet from eight of the world elite companies will be on display during this special event. Gracing the stage will be dancers from Royal Ballet of London, Bolshoi Theater of Russia, Stuttgart Ballet, National Ballet of Canada, American Ballet Theater, Rome Opera Ballet, Royal Danish Ballet, and San Francisco Ballet. Unique to the Canada All Star Ballet Gala will be the program itself, which allows performers from different classical traditions to capture the highlights from all five of the prevailing choreographic styles — French, Danish, Russian, English, and American.

Here is one opportunity to see the world’s greatest ballet stars dance masterpieces rarely seen in Canada. We welcome you all to this spectacular showcase of classical ballet at its most accomplished and refined!

This occasion also provides discerning ballet audience members with a great opportunity to witness a momentous high point in the annals of Canada’s Ballet history. For the first time since its formal inception 65 years ago — an event we have just commemorated — ballet of Canada is standing on par with the world’s top ballet companies. This stature has been attained through critical transformations, specifically the range and complexity of the repertoire, the musical support of a superior quality orchestra, the technical merit of the Soloists, and its unusually accomplished corps de ballet who bring another layer of finesse to the stage.

This Gala is a single, spectacular event that will proclaim, loudly and clearly, to ballet fans and critics that ballet of Canada has risen to a new and unprecedented place of prestige among a handful of elite ballet companies in the world. This new chapter and new order is a cause for great celebration.

With this Gala, we celebrate Toronto, the newest member of world’s Ballet Capital Cities.

THE SCHOOLS OF CLASSICAL BALLET

The origins of classical ballet extend back to the Renaissance period when dance became an inseparable part of court rituals and a symbolic expression of political ideas. Dance embodied the ideals of a harmonious society governed by celestial spheres and dominated by grace and beauty. In the early court ballets, kings and queens participated in the performances alongside their courtiers and queens participated in the performances alongside their courtiers and courtiers, and kings dominated by grace and beauty.

The training of a classical dancer is a long and demanding process, in which physical and expressive, technical and artistic, traditional and innovative aspects come closely together. It is often said that dancing requires a harmony of body and soul. This harmony is not arbitrary. Any movement or pose in classical ballet is harmonized through a position of arms, a direction of gaze, a tilt of a head, and a height of extensions, among other factors. All these important aspects are interpreted differently in the various schools. These differences are grounded in centuries of performing traditions, theoretical writings, aesthetic preferences, and cultural contexts.

The five historical schools corresponding to the distinct styles discussed here are the most representative of the tradition of classical ballet but they do not exhaust the variety of schools extant in classical dance of today. Moreover, as no school operated in complete isolation from others, different schools mutually enriched each other and passed on through their best representatives certain training methods and techniques. Many new schools, appearing outside the European tradition, such as, for example, the Blue Bird in The Sleeping Beauty, have grown through the centuries, and the schools have empowered classical dance to grow through the centuries, and their historical achievement is still evident in relation to the contemporary world.

The schools, blend elements of the Russian, French, and British styles. The training method of Enrico Cecchetti (1850–1928) is a particularly vivid example of the complex itineraries taken by classical dance during more than three centuries of its schooling tradition. Cecchetti studied under one of the disciples of Carlo Blasis (1797–1878), the famous Neapolitan dance master and theorist. Cecchetti’s dancing career developed in St Petersburg, in the Imperial Theatres, where he became the first interpreter of technically challenging solos created by Marius Petipa, such as, for example, the Blue Bird in The Sleeping Beauty. French School

When Henri II, the future French King, married the Florentine princess Catherine de Medici in 1533, he could not have predicted that his Italian wife would bring to France at least two unquestionable cultural treasures—a taste for court ballet and her exquisite library. Court ballet found a fertile ground in France, where it became tightly linked with the court etiquette. Louis XIV, dubbed as the Sun King in association with the Greek god Apollo, was a gifted and passionate dancer. The foundation of the Académie Royale de Dance in 1661 was one of the earliest decrees that the young king signed after becoming an absolute monarch. This decision had a long-lasting influence on the tradition of dance everywhere in the world: dance became an art supported and cultivated by the state. The king charged his Academy of Dance with the task of systematizing the technique of dance and teaching it to his courtiers. Only highly qualified teachers, who were given the titles of academicians, were allowed to give instruction in dance in France. Working side by side with the foremost writers, poets, composers, painters, and sculptors of seventeenth-century France, the ballet masters of Louis the XIV’s period transformed dance from a leisure practice into a professional occupation of intellectual depth, artistry, and technical agility equal to those of other creative arts. Pierre Beauchamps, the first director of the Académie, a famous dancer and choreographer, developed a system of dance notations for his numerous choreographic creations at the court and invented the system of the five basic positions of the feet, which is still used in ballet today.

In 1672, the Academy of Music under the directorship of Jean-Baptiste Lully amalgamated the Academy of Dance. The two joint academies founded a performing company, the Paris Opéra. In 1713, the Conservatory of Dance at the Paris Opéra began to admit younger students with the purpose of training them for the corps de ballet of the Paris Opéra. The special examination system ensured the progress of its students and their passage to upper levels of training. This model influenced other European schools of dance. During the three centuries of its existence the school produced many outstanding dancers. Its technical clarity and stylistic purity developed in close proximity with the productions of the Paris Opéra, which featured such outstanding dancers as Jean Balon, Louis Duport, Marie Camargo, Gaetano and Auguste Vestris in the eighteenth century and then Jules Perrot, Arthur Saint-Léon, Fanny Elssler, and Carlotta Grisi in the nineteenth. The legendary ballerina Marie Taglioni joined the Paris Opéra in 1832 with her signature role in the ballet La Sylphide. In her retirement years, Marie Taglioni, an exemplary technician of dance, started the tradition of the master class, which she gave to the advanced dancers of the Paris Opéra.

The terms applied to positions and types of movements developed in the French school remain the lingua franca of classical ballet of today. The clarity of position and effortless passage between them, the maintenance of a strong axis in a dancer’s body, which allows for an elegant refinement of steps, stability of balances, and regal interiority of emotions remain the distinct features of the French school.
Classical dance came to Russia soon after the Westernization of Russia brought by the reforms of the tsar Peter the Great. In 1738, the Empress Anna established the Imperial Theatrical School and installed the French teacher Jean-Baptiste Lande as its director. The Academy was located in the Winter Palace and trained young boys and girls at the expense of the state, preparing them for the Imperial Russian Ballet, a direct predecessor of the famed Mariinsky Ballet of today. Classical dance became one of the most preferred forms of art among the Russian public. The rapid development of the Russian school in the eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries is credited to the confluence of several European schools and the cultural cosmopolitanism of the Russian capital. The French masters, such as Charles Didelot, Jules Perrot, Arthur Saint-Léon, the Italians, such as Pierina Legnani, Carlotta Brianza, and Enrico Cecchetti, the Danish Christian Johannson, a student of August Bournonville, all worked side by side with Russian performers and choreographers.

In 1847, Marius Petipa, the legendary French dancer, choreographer, and teacher, took the position of premier danseur de l'Imperial Theatres of St Petersburg. It was a magisterial event for the history of Russian and world ballet. In his sixty-year long career in Russia, Petipa created the best known ballets of today's classical repertoire, such as Don Quixote (1869), Le Bayadère (1877), Sleeping Beauty (1882), and Raymonda (1898) among others. He perfected the structure of a narrative ballet by allowing dancers, particularly ballerinas, to showcase their technical virtuosity in the impossibly structured pas de deux and variations. His corps de ballet scenes recalled magnificent tableaux vivants by creating the illusion of a veritable theatrical mystery. Some of Petipa's best dancers, such as Nicolas Legat, and especially Agrippina Vaganova, successfully converted themselves into remarkable teachers, who summoned their stage practice and elaborated it into a system of training. Agrippina Vaganova, who performed with the Imperial ballet as a sujet dancer, played a particularly transforming role in the history of Russian and world ballet. Her exceptional pedagogical and organizational skills helped to preserve the best parts of the Imperial school's tradition through the years of the Communist regime in Russia. Vaganova taught in the Leningrad State Choreographic School, now the Vaganova Academy of Russian Ballet, from 1920 till her death in 1951. In 1948 she wrote a treatise The Principles of Classical Dance, which remains foundational for many schools worldwide, based on her method. At the core of the Vaganova system is the idea of a progressive (through seven or eight years) training of a dancer's body with a particular emphasis on the strengthening of the core, elongation of limbs, and articulation of the dancer's feet with the aim of reaching an expressive coordination between the movements of the upper body and the legs. This idea of coordination in a dancer's body, further supported by the integrated musicality of movements, contributes to the visually beguiling plasticity and expressiveness of dancers trained in the Vaganova method. This method remains at the heart of the Moscow State Academy of Choreography (or The Bolshoi Ballet Academy) and many other ballet schools established by the Vaganova students in the former Soviet Union and numerous countries throughout the world.

The rise of the Danish school of ballet is inextricably linked to August Bournonville (1805–1879), an outstanding choreographer, teacher, and theorist of dance. Born to a French father and a Swedish mother, Bournonville received the French training from the famous dancer Auguste Vestris, who raised the level of technique for male dancers to a new level. In Paris, Bournonville also absorbed the spirit and aesthetics of Romanticism, which dominated European culture in the first part of the nineteenth century. He opted, however, for spending his life in Copenhagen, where his ballets were performed by his own company, the Royal Danish Ballet. Bournonville inherited the techniques from Vestris, his teacher, many technical secrets of the male dance which were subsequently absorbed in the French nineteenth-century ballet. Mostly, he refused choreographing ballets only for the ballerinas on toes. His danseurs and danseuses executed dynamic jumps, pirouettes, entrechats, and other elements of bravura technique with fully extended knees and turned out legs, as dancers of today.

Bournonville's stylistic singularity is particularly evident in the dignity and clarity of poses and a graceful épaulement based on a lower position of the arms. He recommended avoiding distortions or overextensions of extremities beyond the normal anatomical structures of bodies. In his theoretical writings, he advocated dancing as an unpretentious and unnatural expression of human soul. Bournonville's overall choreographic structures of the French version to a dance in which the main characters addressed each other through movements. Bournonville's choreography was more technically challenging for men and women alike but at the same time it restrained dancers from any forced ornamentation, exaggerations, and unmotivated fixation on poses.

His other famous ballets, which remain in the repertoire of the leading ballet companies, such as Napoli (1842), The Conservatoire (1849), and The Flower Festival in Genzano (1858), for example, created worlds populated by ordinary people rejoicing through dance. Bournonville did not use classical mythology or history for his ballets but preferred the Scandinavian folk tradition with an emphasis on moral values and ethics, making his ballets accessible to all levels of nineteenth-century Danish society.

Bournonville inherited from Vestris, his teacher, many technical secrets of the male dance which were further supported by the integrated musicality of movements, contributes to the visually beguiling plasticity and expressiveness of dancers trained in the Vaganova method. This method remains at the heart of the Moscow State Academy of Choreography (or The Bolshoi Ballet Academy) and many other ballet schools established by the Vaganova students in the former Soviet Union and numerous countries throughout the world.
The map of the world ballet was decisively redrawn in the twentieth century. Classical ballet stepped beyond the borders of the traditional European ballet capitals and formal theaters: new companies appeared across the globe.

The beguiling beauty of productions and artistic originality of Les Ballets Russes, an itinerant company, directed by Sergei Diaghilev from 1909 till 1929, conquered the hearts of the public in many countries and continents, where classical ballet had never been performed before. The Communist Revolution of 1917 in Russia should also be credited for the exodus of many dancers of the highest quality from the former Imperial Theaters to the West. The immigrant dancers from Russia organized ballet studios where they taught the foundations of classical style, collaborated with local ballet companies, and often turned into prominent choreographers, such as Bronislava Nijinska and George Balanchine.

Despite being an important cultural capital of the arts, London did not have a repertoire ballet company and a professional school preparing dancers until 1927, when Dame Ninette de Valois, then a dancer with Les Ballets Russes, established The Academy of Choreographic Arts in London and The Abbey Theatre School of Ballet in Dublin. Ninette de Valois received a mixed training from masters like Edouard Espinosa, Enrico Cecchetti, and Nicolai Legat. The effective amalgamation of different schools combined with the preference for articulation of movements and clarity of lines served as a foundation for the British school. Ninette de Valois and the choreographer Sir Frederick Ashton, the two dynamic forces behind the development of classical dance in Britain, set their sights on perfecting a singular method of training, known today as a British school, which defined the style of several leading repertoire companies in Britain, particularly the Royal Ballet, English National Ballet, and the Birmingham Ballet. De Valois and Ashton found support and inspiration for their groundbreaking enterprise among the artists and intellectuals of the Bloomsbury circle.

After the absorption of the dance company of the Old Vic Theater by Sadler’s Wells Theater in the 1930s, the Vic-Wells Ballet successfully led by Ninette de Valois became the leading ballet company in the world, which performed ballets of classical repertoire alongside with the ballets by national choreographers. The list of prominent dancers from several generations, whose careers flourished under the guidance of Ninette de Valois is long, including Margot Fonteyn, Moira Shearer, Antoinette Sibley, Nadia Nerina, Svetlana Beriosova, and Lynn Seymour among others.

De Valois’s remarkable organizational effort and artistic vision of a fully state-supported national ballet came to its complete fruition in 1956, when the Queen Elizabeth II granted the royal charter and became Patron of the Royal Ballet, the Touring Company of the Royal Ballet and The Royal School of Ballet. The Royal School of Ballet became one of the world’s greatest centers of classical training, in which the most rigorous dance pedagogy was complemented by academic education for students. Like other classical schools of today, it is based on slow progression in acquiring ballet technique, a meticulous cleanliness in execution of movements, musicality, and attention to the individual development of students. The school fuses Enrico Cecchetti’s style of training with elements of the Vaganova system, brought to the school by Vera Volkova (1904–1975), a student of Vaganova, who taught at Sadler’s Wells School in the 1940s, and later worked with the Royal Danish Ballet. The example of Vera Volkova, along with other remarkable pedagogues of international reputation, is one good example of how national schools were never insulated from influences but that the schools productively enriched each other through the centuries.
North American School

The Russian factor had a particular influence on the formation of the North American school of classical dance. Anna Pavlova’s appearance at the Metropolitan Opera in New York in 1910 and on the first North-American tour of Les Ballets Russes in 1916 won the hearts of the North-American public with this art of royal origins, which had no historical footing in the United States. The formation of the two leading American repertoire companies — Ballet Theater (became later American Ballet Theatre) in 1939 and the New York City Ballet in 1948 — was instigated by Russian émigrés working with Americans. The latter company is inextricably linked to the legendary name of George Balanchine, the world-famous choreographer who pushed the limits of classical dance to new heights.

George Balanchine, born Georgii Balanchivadze in Saint Petersbourg in 1904, studied in the Imperial Ballet School, where as a schoolboy he performed in the glamorous productions of Marius Petipa. After the Communist Revolution in Russia, Balanchine began experimenting with the avant-garde forms of dance; he borrowed elements and movements from jazz, acrobatics, folk dance, and eurhythmics.

Escaping from Russia in 1924, Balanchine settled in Paris, worked in London, Copenhagen, and New York, collaborating with different ballet companies, from Les Ballets Russes to Paris Opéra, and worked for popular entertainment venues and film productions. This wealth of experience prompted the idea of establishing a new type of a classical ballet company, one that would follow a tradition of its own, and that would express the dynamism, complexities, and optimism of the twentieth century at its fullest. His ideas resonated with Lincoln Kirsten, American philanthropist, impresario, and art connoisseur, who invested his fundraising skills and personal capital, into the creation of the New York City Ballet, to which he served as General Director from 1946 to 1989.

Before launching a full repertoire company, Balanchine and Kirsten put their effort into creating the first institution for teaching classical ballet in the United States. Balanchine’s unbendable decree “But first, a school” proved to be visionary, and the School of American Ballet, which opened its doors for 34 students in January of 1934, became one of the finest classical ballet schools in the world. The SAB’s first teaching staff was predominantly of Russian background, as Balanchine believed in the system of training, which had already proved its coherence. The results of training in the SAB, though, fostered different types of dancers, those tuned for Balanchine’s choreography with its different musical, spatial, and anatomical demands. Balanchine never composed a ballet in the abstract but always worked with the particular dancers, changed and revised his choreography for new generations.

Balanchine created about a hundred ballets during his long career, from which extracting a single style would be an impossible task. Balanchine’s choreographic principles and stylistic preferences, however, can be traced more consistently from his earliest neoclassical ballets, particularly from Apollo, choreographed in 1928, to the non-traditional balletic music, although he restaged some of the classical ballets, such as Sleeping Beauty or Raymonda for his company. His work with Igor Stravinsky was an exceptional case of a modernist paradigm of collaboration between the arts. Accordingly, the schooling in Balanchine style required from students an absolute precision in their footwork, speed, and spontaneity in incorporating space in movements of dancers on stage. Preserving the integrity of the classical vocabulary of poses and steps, Balanchine’s style allowed for crossing the strict limits of classical training by pushing the balances slightly out of axis, by liberating the hinges of the lower body and heightening arabesques and attitudes, and by bringing to the classical dance an elegant athleticism of movements, which was unseen before.

THE PHARAOH'S DAUGHTER

Choreography by Marius Petipa
Version by Pierre Lacotte

The Pharaoh's Daughter was Petipa's first substantial success amongst all of the great ballets he was to create as a choreographer for the Imperial Theatre. Petipa created this ballet when he was still a dancer in 1862 under the tutelage of Arthur Saint-Léon, the Ballet Master of the Imperial Theatres at the time. Carolina Rosati, who danced the role of Princess Aspicia at the première, was a leading ballerina of the Imperial Theatre and was close to retirement at the time of the performance. The dual role of Lord Wilson/Ta-Hor was danced by Petipa himself and this was to be his final role as a dancer as he was appointed second ballet master to Saint-Léon after the ballet's premiere.

Amazingly, it took Petipa just six weeks to stage and complete the colossal production, primarily due to the fact that the ballet was a magnificent success. Petipa chose not to follow the notation scores after refusing to believe that excerpts of the notated choreography that he had been shown could have been Petipa's choreography. Stepanov notation expert, Doug Fullington reconstructed the notated river variations for him, but Lacotte took a dislike to the choreography, stating that it was "too old-fashioned to be Petipa." In the end, he completely re-choreographed the ballet in his own style, even rearranging and making quite drastic changes to Pugni's score. He also restored several variations that have survived and been passed through the personal recollections of great Russian dancers of the past, including his teacher, Lyubov Egorova, one of Petipa's ballerinas. Lacotte's production of The Pharaoh's Daughter was met with success and has since remained a popular member of the Bolshoi Ballet's repertoire.

PAS DE DEUX FROM THE FLOWER FESTIVAL IN GENZANO

Choreography by August Bournonville

The pas de deux from The Flower Festival in Genzano is one of the most famous masterpieces created by the outstanding Danish choreographer, August Bournonville (1805–1879), whose heritage is lovingly and meticulously preserved by the Royal Danish Ballet, the company that became the cradle of the Bourmannville style.

The ballet premiered in 1858 in Copenhagen but was almost forgotten by the early twentieth century. Kirsten Rabal (1922–1999), the outstanding Danish ballerina and ballet master, is rightly credited with reviving this ballet, and particularly cultivating its culminating pas de deux for the world's dancing community. The plot of the ballet reflects on the charm of the pas de deux, which exemplifies a complex ballet form belonging to the style of representation. In this pas de deux, the lightness of passages between the positions, the skimming of the floor points work of the ballerina or a jumping variation of her partner are meant to reveal the feelings the characters carry for each other, and delicately invite the audience to share them.

This pas de deux is a visual delight indelibly etched for the public and a perfect introduction to the sophistication of the Bourmannville style.

Matilda Kschessinskaya as Princess Aspicia in the Underwater Kingdom scene (ca. 1900)
choreographers to create their versions of Petipa’s last grand ballet. Alexander Gorsky, Leonid Lavrovsky, and Yuri Grigorovich were among the Russian and Soviet choreographers who restaged Raymonda. George Balanchine, an innovator of classical tradition and a loyal admirer of Petipa’s talent, created his version of the final act of Raymonda. Rudolf Nureyev staged Raymonda for the Royal Ballet in London in 1964 and later for the Paris Opera in 1983, while Mikhail Baryshnikov, another purveyor of the Russian classical tradition in the West, staged his version of Raymonda with the American Ballet Theatre in 1980. In 2011, Sergei Vikharev, inspired by the research work of Pavel Gershenzon, created a re-staging of Petipa’s original version of Raymonda for the Ballet of La Scala in Milan. The success of this production made skeptics believe that Raymonda could well thrive as a ballet of the twenty-first century as well.

The first performance of Raymonda took place on Christmas day (January 7) in 1898 in St Petersburg. Marius Petipa made a delectable Christmas present to the public of his adopted country. It seemed that contemporaneous ballet music was never as melodious and luxuriously orchestrated as the music by Alexander Glazunov and the sets and costumes were never more striking as those designed by Vsevolozhsky, Director of Imperial Theaters. Pierina Legnani, the Italian born star of the Imperial ballet and an outstanding technical virtuoso of her age, danced the eponymous role of Raymonda, a Hungarian Princess from the era of the Crusades. The unsettling spirit of the twentieth century was already in the air when the Imperial Theater in St Petersburg treated its theatre-loving public to a ballet based on a convoluted chivalric story spiced with imaginary Hungarian and Saracens vernacular motives. In the ballet, two contenders — Jean de Brienne, a Christian knight, and Abderakhman, a Saracen prince — fought for the heart of the beautiful and cultured princess Raymonda. The shallowness of the plot became apparent to the public almost immediately, yet the power of Petipa’s choreography triumphed over the content, and the ballet became an immediate success. The sparse action of the libretto, which was written by Lydia Pas de deux from RAYMONDA

Pas de deux from Raymonda

Pashkova, a mediocre writer from the period, gave Marius Petipa a justifiable pretext to embrace the invention and perfection of balletic form, particularly a pas de deux and female variations. The master was in his late seventies, yet the fount of his creativity seemed to be infinite. No other ballet by Petipa, or any other ballet from the period, had seven solo variations — and all of them different in character — for a leading ballerina. Despite the obvious weakness of its plot, Raymonda survived in the political turmoil of Soviet Russia and the modernization of classical ballet in the West. It surprisingly stayed in the repertoire of the major ballet companies around the world in the twentieth century. This survival of the ballet is duly credited to Petipa’s choreographic inventions: the elegance of his compositions and the difficulty of his technical ornamentations inspired many twentieth-century choreographers.
Romeo and Juliet was the first full ballet choreographed by Kenneth MacMillan for the Royal Ballet. The task of mounting a three-act ballet to Sergei Prokofiev’s music after the stupendous effect of Leonid Lavrovsky’s production brought by the Bolshoi Theatre to London in 1956 was enormous for the young choreographer. MacMillan received a blessing from Frederic Ashton, who already staged his version for the Royal Danish Ballet in 1955.

Despite the lingering influence of Lavrovsky’s choreography and the already influential version by the Stuttgart Ballet, choreographed by John Cranko in 1962, MacMillan discovered his own approach to the Shakespearean story. The balcony pas de deux, composed for Lynn Seymour and Christopher Gable and broadcast by the CBC in December of 1964, lay at the heart of the future production. MacMillan had a particular genius for making a pas de deux into a genre of its own by combining the force of a poetic narrative with a distinctive interaction between the two characters. In the balcony scene, MacMillan focuses on the discovery of love by the two very young characters, whose movements are sensuous and delicate, curious and overwhelmed at once. The speed of their movements, the impetuous arabesques and reverses of both characters, Juliet’s arching body in the lifts — all bespeak the mystery and suspete of love. Daringly, for the period, MacMillan opted for a long kiss on stage at the end of the pas de deux, which came not as an interruption of the action but as the outcome of a fluid, ebullient dialogue between the lovers.

Lynn Seymour, who was MacMillan’s muse for Juliet, did not dance the opening night of the full version of the ballet in Covent Garden on November 8, 1965. Margo Fonteyn and Rudolf Nureyev were considered a stronger commercial draw, much to the disappointment of Seymour and Gable, who had worked closely with the choreographer on creating the ballet. Fonteyn’s and Nureyev’s interpretation of the roles was different but powerful enough to make for 46 curtain calls after the end of the performance. MacMillan’s version of Romeo and Juliet became one of the most recognized versions of Prokofiev’s ballet for the twentieth century.

ADAGIO FROM SWAN LAKE

Choreography by Marius Petipa
Version by Lev Ivanov

Marius Petipa has gone down in history as the father of 19th-century Russian ballet. He was an ambitious man who quickly rose to the forefront of his profession. His thoughts on all aspects of ballet — the dance technique and style, the music, the structure, even the props used — became prevailing practices. Under his aegis Russian classical ballet reached its apex, and the end of his career coincided with the decline in popularity of the genre he had perfected.

And who was Lev Ivanov? Good question. While Petipa’s legacy is undisputed, Ivanov’s is decidedly more problematic. For some he is Petipa’s dependable assistant. For others he is ballet’s unsung genius, unjustly ignored in his time, whose instinctively musical choreography anticipated the developments of early 20th-century ballet and without whom Swan Lake would be a very different ballet.

Ivanov is not a completely obscure figure. We know that he was born in 1834, and that he studied at the Imperial Theatre School with Marius Petipa’s father Jean. He entered the Bolshoi in 1852 and was appointed premier danseur in 1858. He danced mainly as a stand-in for the Bolshoi’s great dancers, enabled by his excellent memory to step in at short notice to roles across all genres.

His career as a dancer drew to a close in the 1870s, and in 1882 Petipa had him appointed régisseur. Ivanov’s illness will have meant Ivanov was involved in all acts. Others propose that the white acts have enough similarity to Petipa’s works that he must have had a hand in them.

Who’s right? It’s up to you: whether you like the idea of a retiring underdog having the last laugh, or classical ballet’s acknowledged master producing his swan song — or a mixture of the two. Either way, we have both men to thank for making Swan Lake one of the most popular ballets that has ever been.
The “wedding” pas de deux from the third act of the ballet Don Quixote is a brilliant pinnacle of the plot, which had already taken the public from the hustle and bustle of the city square in Barcelona in the first act to a gypsy camp, where the two adventurous lovers sought refuge, and further, to a mysterious, dreamy forest in the second act. In current versions, accepted by most major companies in the world, the third act is set in an aristocratic castle, which hosts the wedding ceremony of Kitri and Basilio, the adventurous lovers who prevail over the stubborn parents and societal boundaries to their delight and, that of the public: in the third act, classical dance on pointes dominates, while the Spanish flavor, which governs the first two acts, is reduced to the stylized port-de-bras and details in costumes of the attendants. In the third act, the title character, the Errant Knight of La Mancha, plays no active part but becomes only an emblem of chivalry and love, which he is destined to search for again on his endless journey.

The way in which the finale of this ballet came to the twenty-first century is emblematic of the creative rivalry between the balletic traditions of St Petersburg and Moscow. Just to recall a few facts from the long history of this ballet in relation to the final pas de deux: Marius Petipa created his 1869 version of the ballet for Anna Sobeshchanskaya, the premier danseuse of the Imperial Bolshoi Theatre of Moscow. Léon Fyodorovich Minkus (or Ludwig Minkus, 1826–1917), an Austrian-born composer of the Russian Imperial Theatres, was commissioned to do the music. Two years later, Petipa restaged a more opulent version of the ballet for Anna Sobeschkanskaya, the premier danseuse of the Imperial Bolshoi Theatre of Moscow. In St Petersburg the Moscow public had already greatly appreciated the Spanish flavor of the production and its spirit of sword-and-dagger comedy.

All contemporary versions of the ballet, however, are largely associated with Alexander Alexeyvich Gorsky’s (1871–1924) restaging of the ballet — first in Moscow, again in the Bolshoi Theatre, in 1900, and then, in St Petersburg in 1902. Gorsky was a true innovator of classical dance whose inspiration came from a variety of non-balletic sources, such as the Stanislavsky method of acting, which favored naturalistic, believable communication on stage, and from the Art Nouveau school of Russian painting, which relied on powerful post-impressionist visual effects. Gorsky’s style of staging appealed more to the Moscow public of the period and prompted many negative reviews in St Petersburg. Undoubtedly, Gorsky left his stamp on the choreography of the wedding pas de deux in the way Kitri and Basilio continuously communicate with each other, as if their common, popular origins resist the coldness of the official ceremony. Gorsky was responsible for introducing the lovely harp-solo variation for Kitri, which was found in another ballet by Minkus. It was also Gorsky who made the final pas de deux more technically challenging for the ballerina at least (the development of the male solo occurred later in the century). When he restaged his version in St. Petersburg, Matilda Kshesinskaya, the uncrowned tsarina of the Imperial Theatres, decided to perform the thirty-two fouettes in the coda.

The pas de deux became a favorite piece for virtuoso dancers prone to combining their technical skills with the ability to create distinctive characters even in the structured form of a classical pas de deux. When it happens, the audience is set for an absolute visual treat, in which the ballerina and her partner playfully compete with each other in their soaring jumps, bravura pirouettes, and statuesque balances. The pas de deux’s choreography benefited from many remarkable interpretations introduced to it by the dancers who inflected it with their individual technical traits.
Mikhail Fokin created The Swan as a pièce d’occasion for Anna Pavlova, a prima ballerina of the Imperial Theaters, in 1907. The dancer and the choreographer were in their twenties then. They could have hardly envisioned then that a ballet of less then three minutes long would have an enduring presence in the theater bills for more than a century.

Fokin, who started choreographing in 1905 after having a career as a dancer, chose the thirteenth movement from Camille Saint-Saëns’s The Carnival of Animals (1886), which was originally composed for a cello and two pianos. Fokin and Pavlova, the legend has it, worked in Fokine’s apartment in St Petersburg during one evening. By all accounts, The Dying Swan has remained a stunning example of their inspirational improvisation, in which the choreographer, who sought an innovative approach to the codified classical vocabulary, and the ballerina, with her unusually elongated, limpid body and expressive arms, found an almost ideal collaborative attunement to each other.

It is often said that the fixed choreography for the Dying Swan does not exist because of Fokine’s invention of the holistic movement of the upper body in relation to the exhausting, anxious pas de bourrées suivi of the legs. It has allowed every ballerina undertaking this role to bring her own interpretative details to the poetic depiction of the swan facing death. This interpretive freedom is perhaps the most beguiling attribute of Fokin and Pavlova (who is rightly considered a co-creator).

This short piece quickly became a staple in the repertoire of the grand ballerinas of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. Pavlova alone danced it about 4000 times for different audiences thorough the world. This dance is a choreographic poem without a plot but suggestive of a welter of feelings coming from the soul of a ballerina vesting the idea of death and the finality of life as she transforms herself into a fragile image of a swan.

Although the image of the Princess-Swan already became dominant through the Petipa-Ivanov Swan Lake by Tchaikovsky, Fokin’s choreography should be understood not as an extension but rather as a negation of the traditional choreography of the Imperial Theaters, and particularly, that of Petipa. Contemporary ballerinas and stage directors often fuse these two different images of swans — from Swan Lake and The Dying Swan — by transposing the abstract despair of the Dying Swan into a narrative ballet of the nineteenth-century.

It is often suggested that Alfred Lord Tennyson’s poem “The Dying Swan” inspired both Saint-Saëns’s movement and Fokin’s balletic animation of it. Tennyson was wildly popular in Russia at the end of the nineteenth century due to excellent translations, which could have been read in Pavlova’s and Fokin’s circles. It is less well known, however, that Konstantin Balmont, one the most celebrated poets of the Silver Age of Russian literature, wrote his own poem, “The Dying Swan”, which was inspired by Tennyson. Balmont was one of the most widely read poets of Pavlova and Fokin’s youth. One iteration of Anna Pavlova’s dancing of The Dying Swan survives in a silent movie filmed in Los Angeles in 1924.

Mikhail Fokin made the notation of his choreography in 1935 and supplied this notation with 36 photographs of different poses of the swan performed by Vera Fokina, his wife. In 1997 during its performances at the Coliseum in London, the Kirov (Mariinsky) Ballet presented two versions of The Dying Swan on two consecutive evenings. The Russian version, which was preserved in the theatre and passed from generation to generation by active performers, exemplified the Russian tradition. The other was the “original” version, which was reconstructed by Isabel Fokine, Michail Fokin’s granddaughter, according to the family archives. The two versions, which differed somewhat in steps but mostly in the interpretation of the theme, sparked adamant debates on the originality and interpretations, on the shared authorship between the choreographer and the dancer, and on the possibilities of historical reconstructions of dance in general.
George Balanchine (1904–1983), one of the greatest choreographers of the twentieth century, found a particular affinity between his vision of dance and Tchaikovsky’s music. Balanchine used both symphonic and balletic music by the Russian composer, which was already familiar to and loved by the public. The discovery of a previously unpublished fragment of his work was a fortuitous event for the choreographer. Tchaikovsky wrote an additional pas de deux for Act 3 of Swan Lake at the request of Anna Sobeshchanskaya, prima ballerina of the Bolshoi Theater in Moscow, in 1877. The music, however, remained unpublished and buried in the archives of the Bolshoi Theater until 1953. Balanchine, who solicited permission from the Soviet authorities to use it for his creation, knew of its existence.

The resulting pas de deux, performed for the first time in New York on March 29, 1960 by Violette Verdy and Conrad Ludlow, made no reference to or evoked the slightest reminiscence of the sinister image of the Black Swan. Balanchine saw in the music (in accordance with his famous statement: “see the music and hear the dance”) a celebration of the youthful spirit of life. The pas de deux, which runs for eight minutes, demonstrates the essential elements of Balanchine’s neo-classical language: musicality, speed, and a dynamic spatial geometry, which the choreographer combined with elegance of forms, lightness of movements, and a reckless freedom in executing the most difficult lifts. The gracious vivacity and technique of Violette Verdy (1933–2016) set a lofty standard for future interpreters of the female lead in the pas de deux. Balanchine’s choreography, however, has a remarkable capacity to offer each new generation of dancers a chance to discover something unlimited in their technical and lyrical skills.

The Winter’s Tale

“...Florizel (Francesco Gabrielle Frola), cuts loose in a circuit of jumps — this high-energy outpouring is a climax for the audience... Each of those jumps is different, and seems a poetic part of what a buoyant jump — with an easygoing yet distinctly athletic bravura — what a buoyant jump..." — Toronto Star, 2014

Manon “Francesco Gabrielle Frola made a show-stopping debut as Lescaut on Saturday night with dancing that combined athletic bravura — what a buoyant jump — with an easygoing nonchalance entirely befitting the character. Harrison James was born in Paraparaumu, New Zealand and trained at San Francisco Ballet School’s Trainee Program in California and the New Zealand School of Dance. Mr. James danced with Canada’s Royal Winnipeg Ballet and Béjart Ballet Lausanne before joining The National Ballet of Canada.

Quotes:

Giselle “Harrison James, just promoted to principal dancer, is in many ways the perfect Albrecht: elegant, princely, technically immaculate... James is breathtaking in his inescapable execution of entrechat six... a near flawless turner, ending long sequences of pirouettes with a suspended arabesque balance.”

The Globe and Mail, 2015

La Sylphide “James gave his character a faintly aristocratic aura... his virtuoso solos were executed with attentive consideration for the very particular buoyancy of Bourbonnville style.” Toronto Star, 2016

The Sleeping Beauty “Harrison James was my kind of Prince Florimund: strong, elegant, introspective, then alternately a little arrogant and sweet... There’s emotional sensitivity in his work and then personality, too... steps seem like an effortless extension of his volition and he takes over the whole stage.” The Globe and Mail, 2015

Manon “Jillian Vanstone’s innocence is matched by that of her devoted Des Grieux, corps de ballet member Harrison James dancing a major principal role and acquitting himself splendidly. The chemistry between Vanstone and James is electric.”

Toronto Star, 2015

Carrousel (A Dance) “Jillian Vanstone and corps member Harrison James... show every indication of becoming that rarest of entities, an ideal ballet partnership. James anticipates Vanstone’s every move throughout some extraordinarily demanding duet work.”

Toronto Star, 2015
